

Full-Arch Restorations can be complex and overwhelming.

Going it Alone

As a Single Practice, you'll be competing with National Brands, have no exclusivity, and no clear differentiator in the minds of new, prospective full-arch patients.

Your choice of full arch restorations are dependent on the dental lab's track record and workmanship. Unless it's proven long term this could negatively reflect on your practice and reputation.

You'll need to create everything you need from scratch: marketing materials, website content and ad campaigns targeting people in search of full-arch restorations.

Basically, it's all on you. You'll need to do all the research, develop all clinical procedures, create all protocols, and manage it all alone.

Your bottom line will be affected by not only procedural costs of supplies and staff but vulnerable to the time and money spent replacing final prosthetics that fail.
